SUBJECT: Code Drafting (cont.)

Your e-mail of May 28 gave me courage to do one more draft (if you find the document I sent you to be basically what you had in mind).

After that, I agree, we should put it out for comment. I'd rather you put it out, rather than me, in part for practical reasons. (Our librarian, the e-mail expert, just moved to Denver: she had yet to be replaced; and we have had trouble in the past put large documents on e-mail.) In part, though, I think it important that at least one software engineer is happy enough with the document to put it out. So, I don't want it to go out unless you are happy enough with it to offer it for discussion.

I don't think you need keep me anonymous, but you probably should make it clear that I am trying to work within the list of do's and don'ts the group developed, providing a framework rather than new substance.

Assuming your comments are mostly favorable, I will make one more draft, enter it on the disk you sent me and it to you. Since I had no trouble accessing any of the three versions you sent me, you should have no trouble getting my version back on the net (right?).
